CLINICAL SCRIBE · CONSULT CAPTURE AND FOLLOW-UP

The consult decides the case, and nothing said in it survives the room.

Clinical Scribe is built to record the consultation, draft the letters that come out of it, and keep what was said somewhere the practice can look at it.

CLIENT
Orthodontic practice

STATUS
Built, entering pilot testing

Records the consultation.	Drafts the doctor letter and the patient take-home letter from it.	Surfaces the patterns across consults.

01 THE PROBLEM

The patient says they'll think about it, and the practice never hears what about.

Which objection came up, what got explained, where the hesitation actually started: by the time anyone needs to know, it's down to memory. Follow-up is whatever the coordinator remembers days later, written from a blank text box.

02 THE BUILD

One recording, a summary, and the letters that follow from it.

The system records the consultation and produces a summary of it. From that summary and the exam findings it drafts both letters — the doctor letter and the patient take-home letter — each in its own register. When a patient does not sign that day, it gives the coordinator a few follow-up messages she can read, pick, edit and send, written from what was actually said in the consult rather than from a blank box.

03 THE RESULT SO FAR

Built, and about to be tested on real consults.

Clinical Scribe is built and is being prepared for a pilot on a few real consults. There are no outcomes to report yet: how accurate the summaries are, how much the letters need editing, and whether the same hesitations really do show up across consults are what the pilot is for.

HOW WE APPROACHED IT

The point was never note-taking. Notes are a by-product. The point is that a practice can tell you its close rate to a decimal place and cannot tell you why the people who said no actually said no. So we started from the conversation itself: capture what was said, and let the letters and the follow-up come from that instead of from someone's memory of it.

HANDLING PATIENT DATA

- Designed from the start for HIPAA-conscious handling of protected health information.
- The clinical system runs on dedicated HIPAA-eligible infrastructure, not general consumer services.
- Patient data never passes through consumer AI tools.

Could you say why your last ten no's said no?

If the answer is in what gets said during the consult, that's the problem this was built for. Tell us how yours run and we'll tell you whether it's the same shape.
